Title : SESSION-RETURN ENABLING STATEFUL WEB APPLICATIONS

CONTINUATION SHEET -- APPLICANT INITIATED INTERVIEW SUMMARY

During the interview, the undersigned discussed distinctions between the aggregator token of Flurry et al and the instantly claimed External Session Identifier (ESID). Specifically, the ESID merely identifies a stored session state that is retained at the server. this allows a client browser to navigate back to a previously terminated session and provide the ESID for that session to the server. the server then retrieves the session state corresponding to the ESID from its session memory and at least partially restores the previously terminated state.

Examiner Fritz indicated that he understood the argued distinction, but that a further review of Flurry would be required to determine whether a client sending the aggregator token causes the server to retrieve a locally stored state. Examiner Fritz also noted that a further search of the prior art might be required.

Respectfully submitted,
